DIRECTOR'S NOTES.

In this narrative, Sean approaches romantic intimacy for the first time since his accident, and I want to carry the audience into his world for this specific, difficult step in hopes of inspiring more complex empathy from the viewer.

The voices of burn survivors and amputees are not often heard or seen, and it's important to me to not reduce this character to an object of pity, nor a simple source of inspiration. It's very difficult to genuinely relate to what our protagonist (and lead actor, Prince Amponsah) has gone through, but I want to shine a light on this distinct character, his flaws, anger, compassion and yearning, and allow the viewer to see themselves in someone whose eyes they might not meet, to realize that while the demons he's fighting are gnawing and deep, they are also human and universal.

It is easy to see our protagonist's limitations; in fact, it's impossible to ignore his burn scars and his missing limbs. However, while his barriers are obvious, others' aren't. We're all trapped inside our own minds and bodies, and have our own set of insecurities that may not be so easily perceived by the people around us. In this piece, Sean's barriers are a physical representation of something we all must work towards: to get past our baggage in order to connect with one another in a meaningful way.
